The White Album was recorded in England and Jamaica, and it features a cast of all-star musicians, including George Harrison, John Lennon, Paul McCartney, Eric Clapton, Billy Preston, and Klaus Voormann. The album was produced by Starr and George Martin, and it was engineered by Geoff Emerick.

The album's title comes from its plain white cover, which was designed by Starr. The cover is a stark contrast to the colorful covers of Starr's previous albums, and it reflects the album's more introspective and experimental nature.

The White Album opens with the hard-rocking "It Don't Come Easy," which was written by Starr and Harrison. The song is a powerful statement of Starr's independence and his determination to succeed as a solo artist. The next song, "Mailman, Bring Me No More Blues," is a country-flavored ballad that features Starr's distinctive vocals. The song is a heartfelt plea to be free from the pain of heartbreak.

The third song on the album, "Six O'Clock," is a reggae-infused rocker that was written by Starr and Lennon. The song is a catchy and upbeat anthem to the joys of life. The fourth song, "Wake Up," is a powerful ballad that was written by Starr and McCartney. The song is a plea for world peace and understanding.

The fifth song on the album, "Don't Pass Me By," is a beautiful ballad that was written by Starr. The song is a heartfelt plea for love and acceptance. The sixth song, "Octopus's Garden," is a whimsical and charming song that was written by Starr and Harrison. The song is a tribute to the beauty of the underwater world.

The seventh song on the album, "Living on Borrowed Time," is a reflective ballad that was written by Starr and Voormann. The song is a reminder that life is precious and that we should make the most of every moment. The eighth song, "Cryin'," is a powerful ballad that was written by Starr and Preston. The song is a heartbreaking plea for love and forgiveness.

The ninth song on the album, "Oh My My," is a catchy and upbeat rocker that was written by Starr and Harrison. The song is a celebration of life and love. The tenth song, "Step Lightly," is a beautiful ballad that was written by Starr and McCartney. The song is a plea for peace and understanding.

The White Album is a masterpiece of collaboration and experimentation. Starr's songwriting skills are on full display, and the album is full of memorable songs that showcase his unique vocal style. The album is a testament to Starr's musical versatility and his ability to create a truly special and timeless work of art.
